

Visiting a supermarket in Venezuela is like entering Monty Python's cheeseshop sketch. "Do you have any milk?" The shop assistant shakes her head. Sugar? No. Coffee? No. Soap? No. Cornflour? No. Do you in fact have any of the products that the government deems so essential that it fixes their prices at less than what it costs to make them? No.